Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, supervised, low-impact aerobically and resistance training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of older adults. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 older adults (mean age = 70.5 years) who were randomly assigned to either a supervised exercise group or a control group. The supervised exercise group performed a 12-week, supervised, low-impact aerobically and resistance training program. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. The results showed that the supervised exercise group had significantly greater improvements in physical fitness and health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The supervised exercise group had significantly greater improvements in maximum heart rate, maximum oxygen consumption, maximum power, and maximum force compared to the control group. The supervised exercise group also had significantly greater improvements in the physical function, role limitations due to physical problems, and social functioning domains of the health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, supervised, low-impact aerobically and resistance training program can improve the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of older adults.
