Kline,1987 In September 1980 the Colombian government made an agreement with an Exxon subsidiary for the development of the coal of the northern section of the El Cerrejón region thus entering into one of the largest joint ventures with a transnational enterprise in the history of Latin America In May 1981 the government awarded coal development rights in central El Cerrejón to a Spanish Colombian consortium This book is an analysis of the decisions that led to the two contracts and of the bargaining of an oil importing developing country with transnational enterprises TNEs over a previously unexploited resource during the energy crisis Combining the literature on dependencia and that on bargaining between developing countries and TNEs this book advances a dependent bargaining hypothesis It finds that there was a continuum of Colombian policy makers from the Nationalist who favored energy development with no TNE involvement to the Reactionary who was willing to agree to any energy development proposed by the foreign companies Between those two extremes were numerous varieties of dependent bargainers who accepted the constraints of dependency and TNE participation in energy contracts as givens but who used their political and technical abilities to obtain what they perceived as the best deal available to the country After a general introduction the book investigates the Colombian context for policy making presenting the patterns that had developed by 1970 It then considers the El Cerrejón decisions made between 1970 and 1981 giving historical detail and analyzing the evolution of dependent bargaining over time Finally it presents conclusions dealing with the variety of dependent bargainers and offering an explanation of the variation a comparison of the El Cerrejón cases with similar decisions in other developing countries and the prospects for future Colombian bargaining in the light of the El Cerrejón decisions The Coal of El Cerrejón shows that matters such as coal development in Third World countries are not completely determined by international forces but rather that much of the credit for beneficial contracts and the blame for prejudicial ones rightly is deserved by the political elites of the countries
