

Leadership Styles for Success in Collaborative Work
W. Roger Miller and Jeffrey D. Miller

INTRODUCTION

Environmental advocacy organizations work in conditions of strategic partnerships with other organizations with similar missions for a wide variety of reasons. As with many other nonprofits, collaboration is a key organizational mechanism for advancing their missions. In these tight economic times, foundation funders also consistently call for advocacy nonprofits to think strategically and to cooperate with other nonprofits. Often the first question that foundations ask potential grantees is "with whom are you working?" It is imperative that advocacy organizations, especially smaller groups "play well with others" because they neither have the staff nor the financial resources to successfully achieve their goals without successfully engaging other groups in the effort.

Many environmental groups create intra-sector alliances with other environmental groups or cross-sector alliances with non-environmental groups, including government agencies and for-profit entities. While there are many advantages and disadvantages to each type of alliance, even collaborations with the "right" partners are often difficult to build. A commonly-used phrase describes collaboration as an "institutional art among non-consenting adults," which emphasizes the difficulties that are encountered in virtually every collaborative effort (Waddock, 2003).

Leadership in cross-sector and intra-sector collaborations crosses many boundaries and is fundamentally different from position-based leadership authority or sector-level leadership exercised within organizations. Collaborative leadership differs from traditional hierarchy-based leadership in many ways, such as the emphasis on leading the collaborative process.

Christip A. Larson's study on collaborative leadership indicates that collaborative leaders usually have no formal power or authority and tend to exercise leadership in what is perhaps the most difficult context – when all parties involved are peers (Christip and Larson, 1994). The authors state: "Collaborative leaders have a different focus [from other kinds of leadership] – promoting and safeguarding the collaborative process" (p. 130). Collaborative process leadership activities include "keeping stakeholders at the table through periods of frustration and skepticism, acknowledging small successes along the way, helping stakeholders negotiate difficult points, and enforcing group norms and ground rules" (p. 130).

If this is true, there must be a set of leadership styles that promote success in collaborations and therefore, presumably, success in achieving the goals of the organization. Other research in the literature of the nonprofit sector points out the key role that executive directors play in the development of collaborative partnerships and their inception. If executive directors of nonprofit organizations can utilize specific leadership styles to advance their organizations' missions through collaboration, which styles and leadership actions are the most important? This study asked leaders of reputationally successful collaborations among environmental advocacy organizations which of the leadership styles described in the literature are actually confirmed by their experiences.
