

LOYALTY FROM A CONFUCIAN PERSPECTIVE

The text is considered to be amongst the most studied and widely read in Chinese community. It provides a developing account of the culture and perceptions of the different dimensions of life that the people see as fundamental in culturing of ethical and well-cultivated personalities. The author is an ardent ambassador of traditions of Zhou people in the court conduct and all spheres of life (Eno). The researcher studied the Zhou heritage and became knowledgeable, his intention being to re-establish societal norms to their previous virtues. He had a strong belief that a country's welfare relied on the values of its humans, starting foremost with its leadership. He had a strong assertion that people should cultivate virtues, honor for their neighbors and live responsibly by taking up roles that ensure societal development. The scholar therefore, established himself as a teacher, editor, and philosopher; teaching young people ethics, proper communication and demonstration of integrity in all matters of life; he trained literature, musical arts and ritual; issues he considered important to the culture.

He insisted that there was a need for a balance of studying and reflection playing a crucial role in the development of an individual. He had confidence when children were raised with the proper values then it would be easy for them to obey as adults. He is convinced that humanity only guarantees love and not hate, he, therefore, advises his followers to set their hearts on the kindness of humanity. Through his teachings, students were motivated in their innate abilities to become better to achieve the aspirations they have in their lives through hard work. Acts of valor were encouraged by young people in the community (Eno 78). Risks taken for a worthy cause were viewed as heroic and gestures to be celebrated in society (Eno 74). He tells Zilu "You's love of valor exceeds mine; there is nowhere to get the lumber" (Eno 19).

He believes that the state has the mandate to provide employment for all its citizens. Throughout the book, he encourages rulers to govern with virtue and align the inhabitants with the rituals of Zhou (Eno 5). He uses the leadership model of prime minister Yan Pingzhong as one that should be adopted by successive regimes, he is certain that leaders need to interact with the masses they lead to show respect (Eno 21). These sentiments are made at a time when warlords have taken the leadership of the state of Lu from the dukes. He describes Zichan as respectful, righteous, generous and reverent (Eno 21). To him, these were fundamental traits that people in positions of influence needed to have to ensure that they demonstrated ethics and virtues in their leadership. Teachings from him on good governance ensured that a society where rulers had respect for those ruled was created; dwellers in positions of power were expected to be just and to show ethics in their leadership.
