

2012-2 CALL FOR PAPERS

MENTAL HEALTH & DISABILITY IN DEVELOPMENT

Whilst psycho-social interventions in response to psycho-traumata and PTSD in the aftermath of disasters are not new and well documented, the wider field of mental health & disability in development has only recently been paid more attention to. Global level interventions and publications on mental health & development and especially those on mental health & disability in development are all fairly recent, such as the "Global Mental Health Series" by the Lancet Mental Health Group (2007 & 2011), "Mental Health and Development" in the realm of WHO's Mental Health and Poverty Project (2010), and in part the WHO "World Report on Disability" (2011). Major international disability NGOs – CBM and Handicap International – released their mental health work policies and guidelines in 2008, 2010, and 2011.

In the readings so far, basically 3 descriptions of disability-mental health conditions relations are found: 1) mental health conditions as cause of disability, 2) mental health conditions as equalling disability, and 3) disability as cause of mental health conditions. Depending on stakeholders and perspective, there is a wide variety of terms in use, and it can be viewed as an indicator for uncertainties and some tensions in the field, that this use is hugely inconsistent in 'vocabulary' and meaning, partly even within one and the same organisation or publisher at any given time. One example is the inclusion and exclusion respectively of intellectual disabilities in "mental health conditions/illnesses/disorders etc." Amongst further areas of tension and problems are societal power relations; insufficient budget allocations which are totally out of proportion compared to other health issues and measured against the scope of the problem; lack of human resources; and – with exceptions – continued marginalisation of persons with mental health conditions even within 'the' disability community. The result is that whole populations and individuals are dramatically underserved and uncertainties in the field under-researched.

We invite you to contribute to this exciting emerging field with articles on the following suggested sub-topics:

- Introduction on Mental Health, Disability & Development
- DSM – ICF – ICD
Overview about the interrelations of these 3 (in theory and application); and current revision processes in terms of mental health and disability.
- Disability Studies point of view
