Abstract

Sharks and rays evolved 450 million years ago, during the Late Ordovician Period. However, during the modern Anthropocene, shark populations have declined at considerable rates, and recent global assessments indicate about one in three species is threatened with extinction. A notable reason for this elevated extinction risk is overfishing linked to increased demand for shark fins and other products. Here, we review multiple dimensions of consuming shark products, ranging from stock sustainability, product (mis)labelling and trade, the human health implications of consuming shark products, and illegal, unreported and unregulated fishing and slavery and labour abuses in the fishing industry. We conclude that traceability and increased transparency in seafood supply chains is essential to overcome obstacles to consumption of sustainable, ethical and healthy shark products. We also provide a decision tree outlining steps in consumer choice that would foster such consumption. Our aim is to provide a holistic view on issues concerning the consumption of shark products that will help policymakers, the public, management and law enforcement agencies to advocate for ecologically- and ethically sustainable consumption of shark products and thereby empower the general public to make informed decisions on which shark products they consume.

1 | INTRODUCTION

Sharks have become part of the human diet worldwide due to their palatability, nutritional benefits and relative affordability (Dulvy et al., 2017; FAO, 2020). In some countries, sharks are a luxury food item, such as shark fin soup in Hong Kong and mainland China (Shea & To, 2017). Shark fins are sourced from all over the world by industrial and artisanal fishing fleets mainly to supply the Asian fin markets (Dent & Clarke, 2015). The supply of shark fins has resulted in a rapid escalation in the exploitation of shark stocks worldwide

(Clarke, McAllister, et al., 2006). In addition to fins, shark meat and other products are in demand in the developing world but are traded via different supply channels (Dent & Clarke, 2015).

Third-party certification of fisheries and other global initiatives, such as national and international trade regulations (e.g. CITES, Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora), are used to foster the sustainability of shark fisheries (Martin et al., 2012) and restrict trade of products from species of conservation concern (<https://cites.org/eng/>). The effectiveness of these initiatives is, however, compromised by seafood
