

The copper neutral wires are wound around the insulation shield, and are usually covered with a thermoplastic polyethylene jacket, which ensures mechanical protection from the external environment, and also reduces moisture intrusion into the cable, thus preventing a premature cable failure.

There are two basic categories for cables, the extruded dielectric and the laminated style cable. Examples of the extruded dielectric cables include the cross-linked polyethylene, or polyethylene XLPE or PE style cables, and ethylene propylene rubber (EPR) style cables. In its turn, the paper insulated lead covered (PILC) type is a representation of the typical laminated style cables.

Water tree degradation is a major problem for medium voltage extruded dielectric cables, particularly the service age XLPE and PE style cables. It is perhaps the worst degradation process of the power cable insulation and contributes to the failure of the cable. Water trees are formed and grow in the presence of moisture, impurities or contamination, and electric field over time.
