Abstract—The authors examined the relationship between the use of a computerized decision support system (DSS) and the use of a decision aid (DA) in a simulated emergency department (ED) setting. The authors hypothesized that the use of a DSS would lead to the use of a DA, which in turn would lead to improved patient outcomes. The authors conducted a randomized controlled trial in a simulated ED setting. The study included 100 participants who were assigned to either the DSS group or the control group. The DSS group used a computerized DSS to make decisions, while the control group used a DA. The authors measured patient outcomes, including time to diagnosis, time to treatment, and patient satisfaction. The results showed that the DSS group had significantly better patient outcomes than the control group. The authors concluded that the use of a DSS can improve patient outcomes in a simulated ED setting.
