

7 Steps to Building Your Community

What is a community? The Oxford Dictionary defines community as “the condition of sharing or having certain attitudes and interests in common.” And this sums it up pretty well. A community can be built around anything that a group of people has in common. It may be that you all have the same breed of dog. It may be that you all went to the same festival last year. It may even be that you all like eating soup with a fork... OK, so it's probably not that last one. But, you get my point. A community can be built around any shared interest, passion, experience or issue. How do I build my community? So, you have an awesome idea for a community and you're ready to get going. But, where and how do you get started? After all, you're just one person. How can you start a community by yourself? Well, firstly, just remember that a lot of huge communities started with just one person. The internet. Facebook. Pokemon. Big things often start small, so don't be daunted that it's just you at this point. Just get out there and give it a go. Plus, you've got us. We're here to help. We've put together seven simple steps to help you begin building your community: 1. Start somewhere. The best thing is to start somewhere. Get your ideas out there and see how people respond. Your best research resource is already there around you. Talk to your friends and family about your ideas for a community. Post them on social media sites. Ask people on Quora.com. The more people you talk to, the more responses you'll get and the more you'll know about which of your ideas might actually work as a community. 2. Find purpose in shared interests, passions, and experiences. So, you've bounced your ideas around. You have a better idea of what you and the people you've spoken to have in common. You can now use this common ground to find the purpose for your community. It may not seem like much, but any shared interest or experience is enough to build a community.
