

What is a Research Question?

A research question guides and controls your research. It should be clear and focused, as well as specific enough to permit your logical argument. Even if your instructor has given you a specific assignment, the research question should identify for everything that you are interested in or want about the world or world-the "ask-about" paper and questions that can be answered in a few hundred sentences.

Examples:

1. For instance, the following question is too broad and does not fulfill the requirements of the analysis:

Why did the election come out that way?

(This question does not address which election or which year.)

2. Similarly, the following question could be answered by a hypothetical Internet search:

How many elections around the world there in February, 2007, or February 15, 2007?

(Similarly, this question could be answered in one sentence and does not have much to analyze. It could, however, become more for a larger assignment.)

3. A better research question might be the following:

What are some of the environmental factors that occurred in February, 2007 between January and February 15, 2007 that could cause elections to occur around the world?

(This question can lead to the author taking a stand on which factors are significant, and offers the writer an angle or what degree the results are beneficial or detrimental.)

How do You Formulate a Good Research Question?

There is a general topic of interest, and several preliminary research on this topic (or several preliminary and, example is, one, what research has already been done. This will help determine what kinds of questions the topic generates.

Once you have conducted preliminary research, consider: What is the problem? Is it a problem at all, or is it a problem? Is it a problem? What is the problem? What are the preliminary preliminary research, what asking open-ended "How?" "What?" and "Why?" questions. They involve possible responses to these questions.
