Report of Committee on Nursing Education*

THE Committee which presents the following report was first appointed by the Rockefeller Foundation in January, 1919, to conduct a study of "the proper training of public health nurses."

It was, therefore, the pressing need for more, and for better, nurses in the field of public health that first suggested the desirability of such an investigation. It soon became clear, however, that the entire problem of nursing and of nursing education, relating to the care of the sick as well as to the prevention of disease, formed one essential whole and must be so considered if sound conclusions were to be attained. A year later, in February, 1920, the Foundation requested us to broaden the scope of our inquiry to include "a study of general nursing education, with a view to developing a program for further study and for recommendation of further procedure." "We have attempted therefore to survey the entire field occupied by the nurse and other workers of related type; to form a conception of the tasks to be performed and the qualifications necessary for their execution; and on the basis of such a study of function to establish sound minimum educational standards for each type of nursing service for which there appears to be a vital social need.

Since it was the obvious need for more adequate nursing service in the field of public health which brought to a head the demand for a comprehensive study of nursing education—long felt and first voiced by the official organization of nurses—it seems natural to begin with a consideration of this phase of the broader problem.

It is obvious that the public health movement has passed far beyond its earlier objectives of community sanitation and the control of the contact-borne diseases by isolation and the use of sera and vaccines. Many major health problems of the present day, such as the control of infant mortality and tuberculosis, can be solved only through personal hygiene—an alteration in the daily habits of the individual—and through the establishment of new contacts with the public —contacts which shall permit the application of the resources of medical science at a stage in disease when they can produce a maximum effect. Such changes in the daily habits of the people and in their relation to their medical advisors, can be accomplished by but one means—education. In its present phase of emphasis on personal hygiene, the public health movement has thus become during the past two decades preeminently a campaign of popular education.

The Nurse in Public Health

The new educational objectives of the health administrator may be approached to a limited extent by mass methods. The printed page, the public lecture, the exhibit, the cinematograph, the radiogram, help to prepare the ground and to make success easier. The ultimate victory over ignorance is, however, rarely attained in such ways. Direct personal contact with the conditions of the individual life is essential to success in a matter so truly personal as hygiene. We have sought during the past twenty years for a missionary to carry the message of health into each individual home; and in America we have found this messenger of health in the public health nurse. In order to meet generally accepted standards we should have approximately fifty thousand public health nurses to serve the population of the United States—as against eleven thousand now in the field. All public health authorities will probably agree that the need for nurses is the largest outstanding problem before the health administrator of the present day.

In view of this fact, public health authorities, both in this country and abroad, have naturally considered the possibility of finding a short way out of their difficulties by the employment of women trained in some less rigorous fashion than that involved in the education of the nurse. It was therefore to the question of the necessary and desirable equipment of the teacher of hygiene in the home that we first directed our attention. There are at present two distinct types of public health nursing practice in the United States—that in which the nurse confines herself to the teaching of hygiene, and that in which such instructive work is combined with the actual care of the sick. A third type of visiting nursing, in which bedside care is given with no educational service, may be observed in individual instances. It results, however, from temporary limitations rather than considered policy, since practically all visiting nurse associations, in theory at least, stress hygienic education in their official program.

The question whether the public health nurse should or should not also render bedside care has been hotly debated during the past few years. The arguments for purely instructive service rest mainly on two grounds, the administrative difficulties involved in the conduct of private sick nursing by official health agencies and the danger that the urgent demands of sick nursing may lead to the neglect of preventive educational measures which are of more basic and fundamental significance. Both these objections are real and important ones. Yet the observations made in the course of our survey indicate that both may perhaps ultimately be overcome. Several municipal health departments have definitely undertaken to provide organized nursing service for bedside care combined with health teaching, while in other instances instructive nurses, under public auspices, combine a certain amount of emergency service with their fundamentally educational activities. So far as the neglect of instructive work is concerned it results from numerical inadequacy of personnel and can be avoided by a sufficiently large nursing staff.

On the other hand, the plan of instructive nursing divorced from bedside care suffers from defects which if less obvious than those mentioned above are in reality more serious, because they are inherent in the very plan itself and therefore not subject to control. In the first place—the introduction of the instructive but non-nursing field worker creates at once a duplication of effort since there must be a nurse from some other agency employed in the same district to give bedside care. In the second place, the field worker who attempts health education without giving nursing care is by that very fact cut off from the contact which gives the instructive bedside nurse her most important psychological asset. The nurse who approaches a family where sickness exists, and renders direct technical service in mitigating the burden of that sickness, has an overwhelming advantage, then and thereafter, in teaching the lessons of hy-
