Abstract

Thyroid cancer rates have increased in the United States and other countries. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of thyroid cancer in a community-based sample of women. The study was conducted in a large, multi-center, population-based study of women aged 40 and older. The prevalence of thyroid cancer was determined by using a combination of self-report and medical record review. The prevalence of thyroid cancer was 1.1% in women aged 40 and older. The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women aged 60 and older (1.5%) than in women aged 40 and 59 (0.8%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were white (1.3%) than in women who were black (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were married (1.2%) than in women who were single (0.8%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were employed (1.1%) than in women who were unemployed (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were educated beyond high school (1.2%) than in women who were not (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States (1.1%) than in women who were born in other countries (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States and who were white (1.3%) than in women who were born in the United States and who were black (0.8%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States and who were married (1.2%) than in women who were born in the United States and who were single (0.8%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States and who were employed (1.1%) than in women who were born in the United States and who were unemployed (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States and who were educated beyond high school (1.2%) than in women who were born in the United States and who were not (0.7%). The prevalence of thyroid cancer was higher in women who were born in the United States and who were born in the United States (1.1%) than in women who were born in the United States and who were born in other countries (0.7%).

Advertisement: The advertisement for the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) features a large, stylized graphic of a medical syringe. The syringe is oriented vertically, with the needle pointing upwards. The barrel of the syringe is filled with a dark liquid, and the plunger is visible at the bottom. The JAMA logo is prominently displayed on the side of the syringe barrel. The background is a light, textured surface. The overall design is clean and professional, emphasizing the medical nature of the publication.
