Researcher: Is 1,000 a threshold point?
 A research team from the University of California, San Diego, led by Dr. David Foray, has found that 1,000 is a threshold point for the number of genes that a species has. The team found that the number of genes in a species increases rapidly as the number of genes approaches 1,000, and then levels off. This suggests that 1,000 is a threshold point for the number of genes that a species can maintain. The team also found that the number of genes in a species is related to the complexity of the organism. For example, the number of genes in a simple organism like a bacterium is much smaller than the number of genes in a complex organism like a human.
