When Phosphorus (P) and Sulfur (S) are available in adequate ratios to the soil, they can be used by plants in a relatively constant ratio (about 16% to 20% S:P) depending on the plant species and nutrient levels in the soil. However, if P and S are not available in the correct ratio, the plants may suffer from nutrient deficiency, which can lead to stunted growth and other problems. (Baker, 2000)

These findings have important implications for the design of the intervention. First, the findings suggest that the intervention should be designed to be culturally sensitive and to address the specific needs of the target population. Second, the findings suggest that the intervention should be designed to be feasible and acceptable to the target population. Third, the findings suggest that the intervention should be designed to be sustainable and to have a long-term impact on the target population. Fourth, the findings suggest that the intervention should be designed to be evaluated and to have a measurable impact on the target population. Finally, the findings suggest that the intervention should be designed to be implemented and to have a positive impact on the target population.
