Doing Good Natalia Deeb-Sossa, 2013-02-28 Throughout the New South relationships based on race class social status gender and citizenship are being upended by the recent influx of Latino residents Doing Good examines these issues as they play out in the microcosm of a community health center in North Carolina that previously had served mostly African American clients but now serves predominantly Latino clients Drawing on eighteen months of experience as a participant observer in the clinic and in depth interviews with clinic staff at all levels Natalia Deeb Sossa provides an informative and fascinating view of how changing demographics are profoundly affecting the new social order Deeb Sossa argues persuasively that moral identities have been constructed by clinic staff nearly all of whom are white see themselves as heroic workers Mid and lower status Latino staff feel like they are guardians of people who are especially needy and deserving of protection In contrast the moral identity of African American staffers had previously been established in response to serving their people Their response to the evolving clientele has been to create a self image of superiority by characterizing Latino clients as immoral lazy working the system having no regard for rules or discipline and being irresponsible parents All of the health care workers want to be seen as doing good But they fail to see how in constructing and maintaining their own moral identity in response to their personal views and stereotypes they have come to treat each other and their clients in ways that contradict their ideals
