The Dangers of Texting While Driving

A mobile phone is a vital tool that is needed in both professional and social life. From the time phones were innovated, it improved the way of interaction among individuals in various stages. This form of communication that involved use of mobile phones applied both in informal and formal sets.

Texting is one of the major functions that apply in mobile phones. It is an effective means of relaying information that can offer a solution to handle urgent matters. It is clear that a number of individuals find it easy to send messages while driving. As much as this can aid to bring a solution, it subjects the driver to risk of losing his life. In this regard, it is essential for drivers to consider driving safely by avoiding use of phones. This indicates that they care for their lives and for those individuals on board.

Texting is the less expensive manner of communication that prevents inconveniencies. Unfortunately, individuals tend to ignore the risks that are associated with use of messages while driving. This happens when individuals think they can multitask in an easy manner. Majority of such drivers think that driving while texting is a unique skill that can only be traced among few individuals. According to Austin (1), drivers who ought to send messages while driving were more prone to danger in contrast to those who are drunk.

Research indicates that a driver loses focus when he attempts to text while driving. This is because concentrating on the glare screen of the mobile phone tends to impair vision for a few moments while driving. By the time, he sees clearly, he would have caused an accident. In essence, individuals should take note that no texts is worth their life. To avoid these dangers that are caused by texts, they should avoid using phones while driving.
