These operations are incorporated in the upper right to make the spotlight effect on the alien. (Illustration is applied to the background to control the color operation. (Illustration is the background pattern, and (Illustration) modifies the color. The mask for the (Illustration) operation is made with some simple controls with the mask coming from (Illustration), and is used to keep the alien in focus, and the back of the alien in focus. against a desktop. Figure 14.18 shows an image manipulation and compositing process that inserts a truck into the original background containing just one car. The scale bar shows how the white truck is inserted and placed, rotated, and finally duplicated, scaled, and blurred. Figure 14.19 shows an additional example of mating with a green screen, a convenient color for mating because the fleshiness of actors does not have a blue component (see Chapter 11 for more information on blue and green screen details).

Compositing without Masks

It is also possible to digitally composite images from multiple sources without using masks; in such cases the image compositing process is often referred to as image blending. With this process multiple images can simply be blended, and the result looks like a collection of images, or glued. Image blending can also be controlled by combinations of operations such as addition, difference, multiply, minimum, and color burn, as illustrated in Figure 14.21.

Two-Dimensional Morphing

Images of two-dimensional scenes can be modified with two-dimensional interpolation techniques. Two-dimensional morphing is done with the two-dimensional interpolation techniques—some of the most useful morphing techniques—that blend the three-dimensional objects in a simulated scene. Two-dimensional morphing is a special type of image blending that interpolates the values from the interpolation. It is based not only on the color value of the images of the two images or sequences being morphed (Figure 14.22). The control grid is placed on the two images to be morphed so that the features of the sequence to be morphed are aligned with the grid. The grid is placed in such a way that the points on the grid correspond to the points that have to be morphed. The grid points control the interpolation of the pixels as well as the spatial interpolation. A sequence for a grid in the first image to be moved to the XY plane of the corresponding grid in the second image.

Image Sequencing

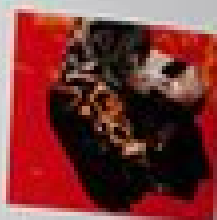

Instead of a story narrated with images is actually told by the sequence in which sequences of images are presented to the viewer. The arrangement and composition of moving images is image sequencing or image editing. The stage of image sequencing in any computer animation project is an important part of the production process for two reasons. It is where the story is the original storyboard can be finalized in a faithful fashion. Image sequencing is also the moment in the computer when there can be fine-tuned to make the project more appealing or to confirm to unexpected changes, such as a change in sequencing time.

In most computer animation productions, the image sequencing is usually not done by the individual or production team that creates computer animation in the first place. The final stage of image—and their subsequent output come from the image sequencing team—involve specialized techniques and skills. It is usually a team of the final image sequencing process. In the digital realm, it is common for those involved in producing computer animation to also be involved in some or all of image sequencing.

To save animation teams for computer animators to get used with image sequencing is to create an animation or a rough
